Roadside Cafes VS Restaurants

The complex nature of the human mind causes it to seek change from time to time, even when it comes to things that are essential for survival; food, in this case, is no exception. Roadside cafes and restaurants play a significant role in serving the purpose. Restaurants are elegantly decorated interior spaces that offer rich meals and roadside cafes are establishments of inferior quality that serve regular food items. Roadside Cafes and Restaurants are similar in terms of offering a diversion from monotonous eating habits, presenting a decent place for meetings, and providing a delightful time while they are different when it comes to expense, choice of food items, and nature of service.

In some respects, restaurants are similar to roadside cafes. First of all, both of these offer a diversion from monotonous eating habits. For example, when people grow tired of homemade meals, they can invite a change by visiting a restaurant, or a roadside cafe if they are on a tight budget. Besides, roadside cafes can present a decent space for a meeting. Similarly, a restaurant can be an excellent place to hold a meetup, both formal and casual. Moreover, both roadside cafes and restaurants are capable of providing a delightful time to the visitors.

On the other hand, roadside cafes differ from restaurants on several grounds. Firstly, a visit to the restaurant requires one to bid farewell to a great deal of money while roadside cafes are far less expensive. For instance, a single serving of french fries usually does not cost more than Tk.50 in the latter but in the case of restaurants, a similar dish can cost more than Tk. 300. Secondly, roadside cafes usually do not offer a wide range of food items. On the contrary, restaurants have an eclectic menu that includes something for everyone. Thirdly, in restaurants, the meal is usually served by a well-attired waiter but in roadside cafes, the visitors often have to serve themselves.

Responding to the desire for a change in eating habits requires one has to consider several factors including budget and taste. Roadside cafes and restaurants, in this case, make the job easier for people. Despite the shortcomings, both of these, without a doubt, hold an important place in our lives.
