

The bar chart shows the expenditure of France and the UK on consumer goods in 2010. It is evident/obvious from the chart that people of both the UK and France spent the most on cars while in terms of spending the least, the French people chose cameras, and the British people preferred perfume.

In 2010, 450,000 pounds sterling was spent on buying cars in the UK. In terms of spending on computers and cameras, the British expenditure was 350,000 pounds sterling. A rise by 500,000 pounds can be observed with regard to buying books. However, the consumption of perfume was the least by the people of the UK and this sector saw the spending of 150,000 pounds sterling. On the contrary/Conversely, though the French people spent the most, namely 400,000 pounds sterling on cars in a similar vein to the British, they spent only 150,000 sterling pounds on cameras. In terms of spending on computers the expenditure was 380,000 pounds sterling. Moreover, in France people spent 300,000 pounds sterling while the business of perfume experienced a decrease/decline by 100,000 pounds sterling.

To conclude, in 2010, the British people spent more on consumer goods than the people of France.
